GENERAL KUROKI IN THE FIELD

GENERAL KUROKI.

General Kuroki is one of the principal Japanese commanders in the field and has done more fighting than any other of the Japanese generals. He has been uniformly successful. He went to the front at the start and has handled an immense army in a long series of maneuvers and battles with masterly skill. General Kuroki has been said to be half-French, and no one in France has wanted to deny the charge. But the general has a nephew who is studying at Berlin and who has seen fit to take up the statement and replace it with one that is much more romantic. The youth says that his uncle is the son of a Polish nobleman and that his name is really Kurovski. This noble was mixed up in the slight unpleasantness between Russia and Poland during the revolutionary times in 1831, and thought it best to go to Japan and make his home there. He married a Japanese woman, and their son is the man who is causing the Czar some uneasiness at the present moment. And he is fighting at the command of his father, for when the old exile was on his deathbed he called the child to his side and made him swear to take vengeance on Russia for the way in which she had treated Poland.
